

ARE YOU RELATED TO AN ANTISOCIAL PERSON?

Antisocial personalities are the most simple and dangerous personalities, who only want from life good fun, some action and immediate satisfaction of all their cravings. We are talking about people who tend to have antisocial personality disorder, which means socially maladjusted or completely indifferent to social rules. Antisocials are most likely to get involved in illegal activities. Criminal behavior is only a part of a wider spectrum, and this is especially true of the antisocial people you encounter in your everyday life.

In colloquial language, antisocial refers to someone who does not like parties and company, which is not the case for our antisocials, because they absolutely love parties.

Antisocials, on the other hand, are loners, as they have considerable difficulty committing to others because they do not trust anyone. Antisocials are often hellishly attractive and hellishly entertaining. It is important to remember about anti-socialists that both the advertisement and the realistic evaluation of his work represent two poles of the same personality, as their characteristics are connected in recognizable groups.

At the very core of an antisocial personality is a craving for all kinds of stimuli. Antisocials are not hindered by doubts and worries, as they accept those risks and challenges that would frighten normal people. The same drive that drives them to heroics on battlefields, in sports arenas, and on the stock market floor prepares them for boredom in everyday life. In their constant search for new thrills, they are drawn to anything addictive. Antisocials rarely think about why they do the things they do, because they just do. Only after a while does it become apparent that most decisions of anti-socials are merely a roll of the dice. For all their flaws, antisocials are easy to love. Immaturity is the basis of their appeal and it makes them so charming.

An antisocial believes that rules exist so that we can break them. He is a master at finding excuses to avoid doing things he doesn't want to do. He's already had trouble with the law. He regularly engages in dangerous activities simply because of the excitement he experiences. Antisocial can be extremely seductive. He is not very good at managing his finances. He smokes in public without asking permission. He has one or more addictions and thus more sexual partners than other people. The anti-socialist is rarely worried because he actually believes that things can be worked out even with the argument of power. He sees nothing objectionable in lying to achieve his goals. He justifies the ugly things he does to others by saying that others would do them if they could. He consciously chooses to lash out if he can get what he wants with it. He doesn't understand why, before taking any step, it's worth thinking about where it all leads. He believes that fun is the most important thing, work will come later. The anti-social has already been fired, or he just quit impulsively. He refuses to follow any dress code. He often makes promises he doesn't keep.

ADVENTURER

The most prominent characteristic of adventurers is their addiction to excitement, which is the basic driving force of all antisocials. From a physical point of view, excitement is nothing more than a sudden change in chemical processes in the brain and body. Adventurers rarely worry because they have much more important things to think about than deadlines, obligations, or how you'll feel if promises aren't kept. They are very fond of taking drugs. Drugs, whether purchased from a dealer or squeezed and endocrine system with dangerous behavior, cause additional problems. When adventurers get bored or when they're depressed, they look for anything that will instantly wash away the bad feelings. In addition to a companion in the game, adventurers usually need someone to look after them, clean up after them, and put them back in order. However, when the adventurers are upright and in their element, life with them is incredibly sweet and inn. Regardless of chemical, behavioral or any aspect of their style, adventurers offer you a wild ride into a parallel reality full of fun and adventure that will take you far away from your workday. Adventurers are very quick to spot people who need a little fun, especially one that involves rebelling against authority. Adventurers are not only men, the female part of adventurers are courtesans who gather strong and creative men around them, completely confuse them and make them do things they would never do. In the real world, adventurers outwit you by becoming part of your lives and tricking you into making one questionable decision after another. Uncertainty is the most powerful aphrodisiac known to mankind. Just when you think they don't care, they show up and tell you exactly what you want so badly.

Your best protection against adventurers is to understand the cravings that drive them. As with other emotionally disturbed personalities, it's impossible to know what adventurers are up to if you don't know their history. In order not to make mistakes from which you will have to learn, it is important that you are completely clear about what your goals are. It will be best to use the adventurers in the things they are best at; for fun and for jobs that others wouldn't accept. Due to their inclinations, adventurers are also the best salespeople in the world, because challenges motivate them, rejection does not diminish their enthusiasm, and with their inner charm they prepare customers to love and trust them.

Adventurers are particularly bold in lying. They won't blind you just because they think it's fun, they'll tell you the version of events you want to hear. If you want to hang out with adventurers, you have to anticipate problems, because they don't care.

Always praise adventurers when they comply with your requests, even if it's just to finally leave them alone. Prepare them to be responsible for a specific thing that needs to be done by a specific deadline.

Adventurers can hypnotize you without lifting a finger. Add to that the casual charm and a parallel reality where there's only fun and excitement and no bills to pay, and you'll understand why adventurers need you. If there is an adventurer in your life, you should know the warning signs; an attitude that is established extremely quickly and in a way that deviates from the norm, thinking in superlatives, reducing the importance of objective information and creating confusion.

For adventurers, you have to win those battles that involve intoxicants. Before hiring an adventurer for any role in your life, first make sure of his or her addiction. Don't think that trying to make the adventurers feel guilty will have a positive effect on them. In life, you have learned the rules of politeness and follow them because you hope to avoid unpleasant consequences. Answer when someone asks you something. Even though it's uncomfortable, I have to do what really works. Emotionally disturbed personalities often choose to take self-destructive actions, then use all their charm to convince others to save them from the consequences of their decisions. For adventurers, the conditioning must be external, as they are usually not mature enough to develop the internal conditioning that guides our behavior. The more automatic the conditioning, the better, because the only way adventurers learn anything is to face the natural consequences of their actions. Most importantly, don't explain the concept of responsibility to adventurers, because it doesn't work for them. Say no to them when you really mean it and don't expect them to pick up on the subtle nuances of the meaning of the word maybe. If you want the adventurer to do something, tell him straight out and don't let him know what you will do if he doesn't do it. Don't bother asking your adventurers to feel what you want them to feel or to understand what you expect of them. Adventurers don't know when to stop. If restrictions are necessary, you must stop them.

ACTION HERO

Adventurers excel in professions that require endurance, courage and quick thinking in crisis situations. You need to know what to expect from an adventurer. You didn't fall in love with him because he's so good at housework, but because he's fun and exciting. You may not be able to change what adventurers are, but with some effort and understanding, you can change what they do. The easiest way for an adventurer to drink you is if you believe that the measure of his love is his sensitivity to your needs. No matter how much they care about you, they will never, except when they conquer you, be able to find out what you need and satisfy you without specifically asking them for it. Women are more socially adapted and recognize the needs of others more easily, as well as offering help more quickly without having to be asked. All the stereotypical statements you've ever heard about men can easily be applied to anti-socials, and this is especially true for adventurers, because only they are masculinity materialized. To say that adventurers don't like being told what to do is an understatement. Do not command, rather negotiate. If you want anything done, you will have to negotiate. An adventurer will never let you get the better of him unless you have more stars on your jacket than his. Life presents you with a cruel choice, you can either be happy or you can be right.

If there's an adventurer in your life, it's best to look to the organizations in which they are most successful - the police or the military. Unlike the military, work schedules are not determined by someone higher up. It is reached through negotiation, as in negotiations between workers and management, except that with adventurers it is not clear who is who. Whatever the task is, talk about it, determine what actions are required for it, and negotiate a list where it will be specified exactly who does what and when. You need to know who is responsible for what. All jobs must have authority as well as authority. When the adventurers start grumbling, don't immediately start an internal drama, but instead consider what conditioning is at play.

Adventurers are at their best when they're fixing cars, fighting baddies, hunting animals to fill the pantry, or having fun after a successful hunt. Give them a mission. Do as many exciting things as possible. An adventurer's heart is always won by a partner who likes the same things as him. If you falter or become too busy with more important things, the adventurers will eventually find someone else. Never pretend that you like the same things as him in order to wrap him around your finger like that. Don't be his drinking buddy. An activity that is not good for you to continue with him is drug abuse. If you are in love with an adventurer, hold the tiger by the tail.

AN UNFAITHFUL LOVER

Adventurers usually love sex, if the opportunity arises they will cheat on you. The simplest explanation is usually the correct one. Ask for time to think first. Don't say what you think or what you're going to do because you don't really know.

You'll give yourself a chance to get your thoughts in order, and this approach will have a stronger effect on your adventure partner than anything else you could say or do. In the time of silence and introspection you will ask for yourself, you must decide whether it is real evidence or just your insecurity. If something happened for the first time, then there is still a chance that it was just a stupid mistake that can still be fixed. Focus on the infidelity, not the lies, and ask yourself how much loyalty means to you, or if infidelity is really so important to you that it could mean the end of the relationship. Also set a time to talk about the topic that worries you and ask your partner what he thinks should be done. If you plan to stay together, it will probably be necessary to seek professional help at some point.

MEN OF ADVENTURE

Most women outgrow the adventurers they married by their late thirties. If you admit your mixed feelings and irrational behavior to others, you'll likely find that all your friends and maybe even your parents have invited their ex back. If you're thinking of taking the adventurer back, don't do it right away. If this is not possible, the divorce procedure will follow. You may hope that the divorce process will be reasonable and amicable, but I wouldn't count on it if I were you. Don't even think about an amicable divorce. You need a good lawyer to keep you grounded. A good attorney should return your calls promptly. You will have to be much more determined than you really are. You don't want a lawyer who advises you to wait and see what the other side does. After the divorce is final, never deviate from the court's ruling. If you separated from the adventurer, then at the first meeting again, at the slightest breach of agreement, take very decisive action.

ADVENTUROUS FATHERS

Adventurers have quite a few children, but they are often scattered among several different families. With adventurers, it's crucial to tackle one thing at a time. Those who already know what they have to do and are convinced that it should be self-evident to others will find such an approach time-consuming and unnecessary. The on-call parent is a concept that is useful long after children have outgrown diapers and night feedings. The reward for taking on the responsibility of duty parent is complete control. Adventurers are the epitome of a fun dad, and they don't like you telling them what to do. Children, on the other hand, are extremely resilient. They may receive a good dose of careless parenting, but they will always grow up to be good people. Before you start a parenting conversation with an adventurous dad, look deep into your own character and heart. Even if you sometimes find it difficult to talk to him, never use children to convey messages. Never forget that deep down your children understand and appreciate your love, effort and structure, which you enable them and which they get from their father.

Adventurers are fun at one point, and can be completely disappointing the next. Don't take it personally, it's not about you, it's about them. Talk to them yourself and forget the grudge. When he needs you, allow yourself to refuse him. If you feel that you need to help him, this service, but at the same time know that it would also be right if you refused the help.

ADVENTURERS AS GROWN CHILDREN

If your adult child is an adventurer, you will have to make difficult decisions for the rest of your life. Always get the adventurer to say directly what he wants from you. Stop pretending it's a loan, because adventurers always need money and if you have it, you'll always give it. Above all, it is necessary to think about which conditionings go together in this. Create stipulations you can stick to - turn the sum into a fee for services. All agreements should be in writing. Whenever possible, the money should go directly to pay and not into the hands of the adventurer. But first, set limits and do what you can.